HISTORY

Shotokan karate is a traditional martial art founded by Gichin Funakoshi (1868-1957), an Okinawan schoolteacher who later moved to Japan where karate became popularized and spread to the Western world after World War II. Shotokan karate has ancient roots in martial arts systems originally from China and India, brought to Okinawa and eventually organized into a system by Master Funakoshi.

What is Shotokan karate?

Shotokan karate is a traditional Japanese martial art using basic techniques of punching, striking, kicking, and blocking. It is a weaponless system. “Kara” means empty, “te” means hand, and “do” means “way” or path;” so Karate-do may be translated as “way of the empty hand.”

More than just a self-defense system, Shotokan karate is a time-tested system of character development. You may have to train for a while to see it, but you will find yourself becoming a better person through the study of Shotokan karate.

What do we do in karate class?

Each karate class has four sections:

Warmup – a series of aerobic activities and stretching

Basic karate techniques or Kihon – this is where we practice our punches, kicks, and blocks, usually combined with movement across the floor

Partner work or Kumite, leading to non-contact sparring activities always performed with safety in mind

Patterns or Kata, combining multiple techniques into a series of motions against an imaginary opponent
